Abstract: This thesis examines the poetry of Langston Hughes, focusing on themes of identity, race, and social justice prevalent in his works. Hughes's poetry serves as a reflection of the African American experience in the early to mid-20th century United States, celebrating cultural identity, critiquing social injustice, and advocating for empowerment and resilience. Through a close analysis of selected poems such as "The Negro Speaks of Rivers," "Harlem (Dream Deferred)," and "Mother to Son," this study explores how Hughes navigates the complexities of race and identity while addressing universal themes that resonate across cultures. By contextualizing Hughes's poetry within the socio-political landscape of his time and examining its enduring relevance in contemporary society, this thesis seeks to illuminate the profound impact of Hughes's literary legacy on the ongoing struggle for equality and social change.

Introduction: Langston Hughes, a seminal figure in American literature, remains celebrated for his poetry, which encapsulates the essence of the African American experience while advocating for social justice and equality. Born in 1902 in Joplin, Missouri, Hughes emerged as a leading voice of the Harlem Renaissance, a cultural and intellectual movement that flourished in the 1920s and 1930s. His poetry, characterized by its lyrical intensity, social consciousness, and vivid imagery, captures the struggles, triumphs, and complexities of African American life during a tumultuous period in American history.

This introduction provides an overview of the themes and significance of Hughes's poetry, emphasizing its enduring relevance in contemporary discourse on identity, race, and social justice. Through an exploration of selected poems and critical analysis, this study aims to elucidate the profound impact of Hughes's literary legacy on the literary canon and the ongoing fight for equality and justice in American society.

In this context, the introduction outlines the structure of the thesis, highlighting the key themes and methodologies employed in the analysis of Hughes's poetry. By situating Hughes within the socio-political landscape of his time and examining the intersectionality of his works with broader cultural and historical contexts, this study seeks to provide a comprehensive understanding of his contributions to American literature and the enduring resonance of his poetry in shaping contemporary conversations on race, identity, and social justice.

Main part.

Early Life and Influences: This section will provide background information on Langston Hughes's upbringing, education, and early influences. It will explore how his experiences shaped his worldview and informed his poetry, focusing on key influences such as his childhood in the Midwest, his travels abroad, and his encounters with racism and discrimination.

Harlem Renaissance and Cultural Identity: This chapter will examine Hughes's role in the Harlem Renaissance, a vibrant cultural and intellectual movement that celebrated African American art, music, and literature. It will analyze how Hughes's poetry contributed to the flowering of black culture during this period and how he articulated a sense of cultural identity and pride through his works.

Themes of Race and Social Justice: This section will delve into Hughes's exploration of race and social justice in his poetry. It will analyze how he critiqued the pervasive racism and inequality of American society, addressing themes such as segregation, discrimination, and the African American struggle for civil rights. Poems such as "The Negro Speaks of Rivers" and "I, Too, Sing America" will be closely examined to illustrate Hughes's engagement with these issues.

Empowerment and Resilience: Here, the focus will be on Hughes's portrayal of African American resilience and empowerment in the face of adversity. The chapter will analyze how he celebrated the strength and endurance of black individuals and communities, offering messages of hope and resilience in poems like "Mother to Son" and "Still Here."

Intersectionality and Universal Themes: This section will explore the intersectionality of race, class, and gender in Hughes's poetry. It will examine how he addressed universal themes of love, longing, and human experience while also highlighting the unique challenges faced by African American women and other marginalized groups. Poems such as "Dream Boogie" and "Madam and the Phone Bill" will be analyzed to illustrate Hughes's nuanced portrayal of identity and social dynamics.

Legacy and Contemporary Relevance: The final chapter will assess the enduring legacy of Langston Hughes's poetry and its contemporary relevance. It will examine how his works continue to inspire and provoke readers, shaping conversations on race, identity, and social justice in the 21st century. The chapter will also consider Hughes's influence on subsequent generations of writers and activists, highlighting his ongoing impact on American literature and culture.

Each chapter will include close readings of selected poems, critical analysis of thematic elements, and discussion of relevant historical and cultural contexts. Through this comprehensive examination, the main part of the thesis will provide a nuanced understanding of Langston Hughes's poetry and its significance in the broader landscape of American literature and social activism.

Conclusion:

Langston Hughes's poetry stands as a testament to the enduring power of art to illuminate the human experience and advocate for social change. Throughout his body of work, Hughes deftly navigates themes of identity, race, and social justice, offering a poignant reflection of the African American experience while also addressing universal themes that resonate across cultures and generations.
